Gloucester Township has been leading the way in implementing numerous solar energy projects over the past several years. The township's robust solar program currently features a total of 12 sites on government buildings, schools and landfills, with the Timber Creek Solar Park being the largest single location project to-date. The township's energy consultant, Blue Sky Power, has been working closely with Mayor Mayer and Council to implement the Gloucester Township Energy Master Plan in an effort to make Gloucester Township a national leader in clean energy and sustainability.

On Thursday, November 14th, Mayor David Mayer met with students of the Youth-Build Philadelphia Charter School's "Green Building" program, as well as the program's director, George Jenkins. YouthBuild Philadelphia serves at-risk young adults who dropped out of high school after struggling in the traditional school environment. The program offers a supportive, community-oriented environment to help students earn their high school diploma while learning valuable job skills.

Their Green Building program teaches students about sustainable building practices such as solar and chemical-free materials. The students met with Mayor Mayer and Blue Sky Power to learn about the various solar projects that have been accomplished and are being accomplished here in Gloucester Township. This experience was vital to the students as many of them are eager to pursue a post-graduation career with a focus on renewable energy and sustainable projects.

Students observe the township's solar-charged electric vehicles that are used by the Construction Office.

Meet and greet with the Mayor and other Township Officials as they discuss Gloucester Township's various solar projects.
